Course Description:

In this course, we are going to explore two main debates concerning our closest relationships. The first begins with a skeptical challenge to the idea that human beings are free and responsible agents. While much of the philosophical discussion about free will has centered on the questions of whether we have it, recently there has been more attention to the question of what would we lose (or gain) if we aren't really free agents. For example, some have argued that if we are not free, then we are not the sorts of agents for whom it is appropriate to direct certain attitudes such as gratitude, resentment, indignation, forgiveness, and love. But if such attitudes are not appropriate, then we cannot have the kinds of valuable interpersonal relationships we think we have. Or, to take another example, others have argued that friendship and loving relationships that are not freely chosen are less valuable than ones that are freely chosen. In the first part of this course, we will examine and assess a variety of arguments like these, and in the process try to figure out what is at stake and how valuable it is in the debate over whether we are free and morally responsible agents. In so doing, we will have occasion to explore the nature of so-called "special obligations" we have as friends and family members, among others. With an understanding of different theories of such duties, in the second part of the course, we are going to turn to questions about how these duties fit with or, perhaps, conflict with duties we have as fellow citizens and human beings.

Specific course topics and readings

All readings are available through the Tritoned course web site, but one book, Family Values by Swift and Brighouse, is highly recommended.
