

The title is "Social Practices and Ideology"

The term 'ideology' is used in several ways, and each way calls for a different account. In this paper I sketch a theory of social practices and argue for a conception of ideology that emerges from attention to the way public meanings are encoded in social know-how through participation in (unjust) practices. This account potentially has implications for both epistemology and moral theory.