"It is widely believed that George Berkeley's famous Master Argument constitutes a self-contained but also preposterous argument for idealism, the thesis that sensible things such as tables and trees are nothing but mind-dependent ideas or collections thereof. My aim is to establish that the argument, rightly understood, is not a piece of reasoning for idealism, that it is not self-contained, and, more importantly, that it is not preposterous."